The panel ended in 2020 after completing its second event. It followed up on the IUSSP nuptiality panel (2011-2015), which covered a wide variety of behaviors, but emphasized changes in the tempo and quantum of more conventional behaviors (e.g. marriage and divorce). This one focused on more flexible forms of partnerships, such as cohabitation, living-apart-together relationships, and repartnering. The panel's main goal was to address theoretical explanations for changes in family formation in cross-national perspective, and to assess the consequences for populations and societies. This panel was followed by a new panel on Family Behaviour in East Asia and Southern Europe, with a strict geographic focus.
